Obituary

PROFESSOR D. P. COSTELLO

BRILLIANT RUSSIAN SCHOLAR

Professor Paddy Costello, Professor of Russian at the University of Manchester, who died unexpectedly on Sunday at the age of 52, was a brilliant and highly individual scholar with a wide range of talents and experience.

Returning to university life in 1955, after 15 years in New Zealand army and government service, he was refreshingly un-academic and somewhat outside the familiar ring of sovietologists. His views were usually independent and always interesting; they were often pungently expressed in his slightly clipped and nasal voice. His friends here will remember him as unforgettably good company, an unscrupulous arguer, the subject of countless stories, a man who could make any occasion come alive.

Desmond Patrick Costello was born in Auckland on January 31, 1912, to parents of Irish origin, and was educated at Auckland Grammar School and University College. He then came on a travelling fellowship to Trinity College, Cambridge, where he got a first class in the classical tripos. While there he went to stay with his first cousins in Ireland, and learnt the Irish language; he was always very deeply attached to that country, sometimes seeming as much Irish as Antipodean. In 1936 he became an assistant lecturer in Classics at Exeter University College, where he stayed until the second year of the war.

He then joined Freyberg's Second N.Z.E.F. He was a lance-corporal in the 21st Battalion Signals when the battalion was overrun by German armour at the right end of the Olympus line in 1941, and battalion headquarters itself surrounded. Costello could speak modern Greek, and he helped lead its members down to the sea and negotiate for a caïque. The islands proved to be enemy-held, and part of the crew were accordingly in favour of landing in Turkey and getting interned. They were voted down by the colonel, the adjutant, and Costello, who succeeded in bringing the boat safely to Crete.

On hearing this story Freyberg sent him to be trained as an officer, and so he missed the Cretan campaign. He became, briefly, a second-lieutenant with the Long Range Desert Group, then helped revise the official handbook on the Italian Army for G.H.Q. Middle East. Here he amused himself learning Russian. Freyberg soon pulled him out, however, and made him his Intelligence Officer at Divisional Headquarters, later his G.S.O.3 (I). As such he went with the division through the African and the early part of the Italian campaigns, briefing the General not only on the enemy opposite, but also on the Russian front, on which Freyberg always kept one impassive eye. He was greatly respected by his colleagues in the British Army, where he himself would certainly have held a much higher rank.

DIPLOMAT IN MOSCOW

(U)

He left the Army in 1944 to go as Second Secretary to the New Zealand Legation in Moscow. It is said that Peter Fraser, the then Prime Minister, asked him what his politics were. "I'm afraid I'm a bit left wing, Sir", said Costello. The Prime Minister, jumping a bit ahead of the truth: "Oh well, it won't hurt us to have one or two Communists in Moscow." He was in Moscow for six years, where his elder children went to Russian schools (even fiercer crammers than the French, according to Costello) and he himself became a good friend of Pasternak. He moved thence in 1950 as First Secretary to the Legation in Paris, but found diplomatic life there a good deal less interesting. The ordinary social round of a diplomat bored him; his function as a glorified intelligence officer (once more), advising an uncompliant government on the course of events in France itself and the French Union, struck him as ineffective. He was not sorry when friends pressed him to put in for the newly created post of Professor of Russian at Manchester University, though he was conscious of the hard work which this would mean for one who had learnt his languages largely as an amateur.

(S)

His appointment in 1955 was a source of considerable strength to the university in general and the Faculty of Arts in particular. He rapidly won the admiration of his colleagues, and was instrumental in affording unique opportunities to students of science to study the Russian language in order to read original sources. He leaves the department revitalized by his energies.

In 1948 he had edited the second edition of Maurice Baring's Oxford Book of Russian Verse. The sheer need, however, to master every aspect of the subject for which he was now responsible left him little time for major writing, and his best work was certainly still to come when he died.

In his own field (and on the subject of traditional ballads in all languages, which he knew well both as scholar and as singer) he was a valued reviewer for The Times Literary Supplement, and he also contributed to other learned journals. He edited Gribodeyov's Wit from Woe (the Russian text) for the Oxford Press; he was preparing to translate a volume of Chekhov stories for the World's Classics; he was also helping to edit a new Russian-English dictionary for the same publisher. Outside this sphere he translated Sadegh Hedayat's novel The Blind Owl (John Calder, 1958) from the Persian—a language which he learnt while in Paris—and himself wrote a novel during his Moscow period; this, however, was unpublished. It is a very great pity that he was not able to do more.

He married Bella Lerner in 1935. They have three sons and two daughters.

State University; (2) Arthur Lerner and wife Edith are British and have only visited US to see Abba Lerner. Both are self-admitted former CP members in England; (3)

[redacted] Only the Abba Lerner and [redacted] are in the U. S. and as such are of interest to us; however, the only data we have concerning them is that [redacted] is [redacted] in [redacted] at [redacted] and will remain there until 8-64. He was a lecturer at University of Manchester where Desmond Costello was a professor. He is a [redacted] and was [redacted] until he fell out of favor because of his outspoken criticism of political affairs in Yugoslavia. He has visited US from Manchester, England, three times since 1960 for purposes of lecturing. His exit from Yugoslavia has been viewed suspiciously by informants because of his prior difficulty with Tito. Abba Lerner, the other person in the US, has come to our attention in 1943 when arrested by FBI for aiding and abetting an individual in evasion of the draft. He has communist leanings but we have not tied him in with CP here. [redacted]

[redacted] Only the Abba Lerner and [redacted] are in the U. S. and as such are of interest to us; however, the only data we have concerning them is that [redacted]

[redacted] is presently a member of [redacted] faculty and will remain there until 6/65. He was a lecturer at University of Manchester where Desmond Costello was a professor. He is [redacted] and was [redacted] until he fell out of favor because of his outspoken criticism of political affairs in Yugoslavia. He has visited US from Manchester, England, three times since 1960 for purposes of lecturing. His exit from Yugoslavia has been viewed suspiciously by informants because of his prior difficulty with Tito. Abba Lerner, the other person in the US, has come to our attention in 1943 when arrested by FBI for aiding and abetting an individual in evasion of the draft. He has communist leanings but we have not tied him in with CP here. In absence of a specific allegation that either Lerner or [redacted] is cooperating with Soviet intelligence, no additional investigation appears necessary. (TS) [redacted]
